

The smoking gun is rarely a gun.

Almost no one is caught the way the movies promise. What catches a killer, nearly every time, is smaller and quieter: the one thing he forgot he left behind.

A cell tower that puts a phone on a lonely road. A Fitbit still counting a woman's steps after her husband swears she was already dead. A search for "what happens when you die," typed minutes after a murder.

Forty-three true cases from Canadian and American courts, each undone by a single thread of evidence, and each anchored to a real court decision you can look up yourself.

Every case is real.

Everything remembers now.
